SARAH EMELINE LISH HOAGLAND

(Told to Eliz. McDonald by Matilda Hoagland Wood)

Sarah Emeline Lish was born 22 March 1857 at Willard, Box Elder County, Utah. She was the daughter of Johnathan Hustus Lish and Matilda Langford. Her mother died when Sarah was still a young girl and she and her two sisters were raised by their father.

On 6 April 1875, she was married to Edward T. Hoagland, the second child of Abraham Lucas Hoagland and Agnes Taylor. On 11 October 1875, Edward was ordained to the office of Seventy by Brigham Young, Jr. and shortly after was called to the Australian Mission.

Sarah stayed in Salt Lake City until her husband's return from Australia. During this time their first child, a son, James Taylor Hoagland, was born.

Sarah's husband was a school teacher for a while in Salt Lake City and then they moved to Oakley, Idaho where he continued to teach school. They lived in the vicinity of Oakley for a number of years until Edward decided to quit teaching and go into farming at Hagerman, Idaho.

At Hagerman, during a diphtheria epidemic, Sarah nursed in the community. She would go out each morning, and at night when she returned, she removed her clothes in a building behind the house and then she washed herself and fumigated her clothing before going into her own family. So great was her care that not one of her family contracted diphtheria from her.

In 1903, when her daughter Matilda was sixteen years of age, the family moved to Falk, Idaho. Here they managed a small store and the U.S. Post Office Branch. At Falk, Sarah continued her nursing activities. She also took loads of freight from Boise to Falk. The family raised vegetables and Sarah would load up a wagon and, taking Matilda to tend the baby, peddle the vegetables to nearby towns and homes along the way. When noontime came, they would stop to eat their lunch and Sarah would take a large watermelon and break it open for the horses. On one of these trips, Matilda saw a large black cloud and called her mother's attention to it. Her mother stopped the horses, unhitched them and tied them to the back of the wagon. Then she calmly settled her children and herself under the wagon. As soon as the storm of hail hit, the horses put their heads under the wagon for protection, too.

Sarah was continually in demand to deliver the babies of the community. Many times a second mother would need her services before the first was able to care for her child herself. She lost only one mother in all her midwifery - her own daughter, Agnes Lish Hoagland. Matilda was then pressed into service. She laughingly states that it is a wonder she ever wanted any children of her own because she bathed so many when she was growing up.

Most of the time during Sarah's married life, the family lived on the fringes of civilization where there were always opportunities to help others, but not much opportunity to attend any organized ward or branch of the Church. At Hagerman the Sunday School was held in Sarah's home and, after the services were over, the members numbering about thirty, would stay for Sunday dinner. Daughter Matilda was elected to wash the dishes.

From Falk, Sarah and her husband moved to a spot called Peaceful Valley or Riverside in the vicinity of what is now Houston, Idaho. At Peaceful Valley, Sarah suffered a stroke. She had several in the succeeding years and died 11 June 1924 at Roseberry, Idaho. Her death, however, was caused from burns she received from trying to burn some kerosene which had been spilled on the floor from a broken lamp.

As she was cared for after this accident until the time of her death, she never complained, although two thirds of her body had been burned.

One of her son's wives said of her, that she was a generous, busy woman. She never had much of the luxuries of life, but whatever she had she was always willing to share and she enjoyed people. Her grandchildren enjoyed visiting her because she was never too busy to visit with them. She kept most of the grandchildren in knitted mittens. All of them can remember "Grandmother's mittens."
