This was really interesting, Barry, because I had no idea that New Caledonia is a French territory, nor did I know what places were included in the Fiji Mission, but as soon as Lili read "New Caledonia" aloud from the list of place names I had an immediate powerful feeling that that's where she'd go (told her my feeling too). Of course the impression was strengthened when we learned more about the place.

I did know that Caledonia was an ancient Roman name for one of the countries of Great Britain, but I couldn't remember which one-- and that didn't clue me in to its French Connection, either. Anyway, and you may already have known this, Captain Cook gave the island its name, because it reminded him of Scotland, which is of course the British isles country the Romans called Caledonia.

I don't know if Lili knows about the corn plant (I haven't heard her speak of it and her interest is greater than her knowledge, natch), but I'm sure she'll respond to your query tomorrow or soon. She's gone to bed for the night, which is where I'd better go now.

Love,

Betsy

P.S. I can't resist sending my favorite "Libby of the Day":

Susanna & her two babies & Lili & I went to SLC today. Lili was crammed in the backseat between the two little ones; she thought it was going to be fine and had volunteered to sit there, but I think she was frazzled by the end, even tho' the kids were very easy as kids that age go. Anyway, at one point Libby was driving Lili nuts poking at her (Lili's) watch constantly, out of fascination (and some envy, I think). Lili asked her repeatedly to stop and finally said something not at all unkind, but very firm and effective. Throughout the whole drive, both up and back, Libby had been cuddling Lili's arm, leaning on it, etc. Quite some time after the watch episode, Libby suddenly said, "It's very hard to be close to your arm [indicating Lili's watch]."
