

5

The period from 1607-1789 was marked by a minimum amount of institutional restraints and a maximum degree of individual liberty depending on what sex you were, what your color was and the time period in which you lived.

The American black slave of course, did not enjoy any liberties and endured maximum restraints in all respects - in spite of this and to their great credit, blacks were able to form family relationships + even kin relationships although these were fragile. The black woman, as evidenced by large mulatto population were sexually exploited by the master, and her children even though half white inherited slavery. Not all black-white relationships were disadvantageous for black female, however. many different treatment such as... by such of... owners.

It would be many years before the American black population would be freed - and many more before he could come anywhere near gaining an equal opportunity with his white American compatriots. There is still so much to be done.

TR=CT+ large

You really have some gaps in your answer where you do not address some very fundamental questions. Further, you really need to make more comparisons.