

Lyle's document on the 1530's letter "Little to mother" talked about a child being more influenced by those around them than by his "inherent nature".

Thomas Bellant wrote a book on the "Language Learning of children in which he suggested that while early Babel's training was important of the father's government the child should come to it by his own consent & the mother using the "teaching moment".

He also said parents should let children have a "happy" childhood and parents proper playmate and toys.
The one about school in the inherent essence and malleability of the child.

Although the child approach gradually came around to the story the importance of children, the right of parents by the end of the 19th century the emphasis had shifted from the father being dominant in the child's training.
To the mother's dominance in that training.

Nevertheless became "child rearing" and child rearing of utmost importance in the home.

Generally good discussion; however, you didn't really address the question of the changing perceptions of the native of children in the 18th + 19th centuries; Be sure you don't get carried away with background so that you forget the question.

The father's role was prominent. At were his role to bring his wife and children back to work. There was much of the idea that "if you speak" The God you would spoil the child." Rural matters, while present in generally tend to.

There are other new government up to the point of the Revolution.
Stumpson, Queen of England college, summer the spirit of America D. The father was the dominant figure with raising of children. From the 4th month.

3) The child remained in the home.
3) Of the parenting was successful The child would have a moral conscience by the time he was 16 months old.
4) The training was to be fundamentally physical.

In spite of his intention of the "old" idea of child rearing, he did not condemne church method of child rearing.
The idea of the right to make your own decisions, as Quakers etc spoke by the Revolution began as change child role.
